

Helping Children Deal with Stress after Divorce

September 2019

Ron Cox

Assistant Professor, Human Development and Family Science

Matt Brosi

Associate Professor, Marriage and Therapy

Todd Spencer

Doctoral Student in Marriage and Family Therapy

Divorce can be a difficult experience for each family member. While you are adjusting to the changes brought by the divorce, it is important to remember that your children may be experiencing their own post-divorce stress. Sometimes it can be difficult to identify when children are struggling and how you can best help them cope with stress. Every family is unique and has its own experience, but regardless of your experience with divorce, there are some important things to remember about helping your children adjust in healthy ways.

How Can Divorce Cause Children Stress?

For children, divorce is typically associated with decreased contact with at least one parent. This is difficult because the majority of children want to continue relationships with both parents. It is common for children to blame themselves for the divorce. This is most common in children younger than 6, but can occur at any age. In addition, the changes associated with divorce often disrupt the children's routine and increase the number of transitions they experience.

Each Sibling May Experience or Show Stress Differently

Every child is unique and may exhibit stress differently. It is often difficult to know how your children are coping with the stressors of divorce because they may not talk about how they are feeling or adjusting. It is important to be sensitive to how the divorce is affecting each of your children.

Signs That Your Child May be Experiencing Significant Stress:

- Increased aggression or irritability
- Being clingy to trusted adults and more anxious around strangers
- Regressive behaviors begin to occur, like thumb-sucking and bed-wetting
- Often appearing sad, depressed or anxious
- Becoming more withdrawn
- Losing interest in activities they normally enjoy
- Increased disobedience or defiance to rules
- Difficulty transitioning and adjusting

Oklahoma Cooperative Extension Fact Sheets are also available on our website at: facts.okstate.edu

- Acting out in school or poor school performance
- Refusing to eat or overeating
- Frequent stomachaches, headaches or tiredness

Three Ways Parents Can Help Children Cope with Stress

Effective Parenting

Being an effective parent requires being warm and supportive as well as consistent with discipline. This is particularly true in helping children adjust to divorce. Being both supportive and consistent with rules helps children feel a greater sense of control and stability. It is common for parents after a divorce to feel hesitant about setting limits with children. However, children will adjust more quickly when there is predictable and consistent parenting.

Nurturing the Parent-Child Relationship

How well children adjust after divorce is largely influenced by the quality of the relationship they have with their parents. You can strengthen the bond with your children through spending more one-on-one time with each child, maintaining family routines and communicating effectively. It is important for your children to feel like you care and understand why the divorce is difficult for them. Parents who learn to listen with empathy to their children's concerns about the divorce help children process their emotions and ultimately adjust better and have a better relationship with both parents. By nurturing your relationship with your children, you are letting them know you will always love and support them. When children feel supported, they are able to cope better with stress.

Managing Conflict

One of the most toxic things for children's adjustment to divorce is ongoing conflict between their parents. Children typically love both parents, and when they witness arguments between their parents, it can damage the parent-child relationship. While it can be difficult to put aside past hurts and interact with a former spouse without conflict, parents who are able to put their children first and not argue in front of them will help reduce the amount of stress they experience.

References

- Amato, P. R. (2014). The consequences of divorce for adults and children: An update. Drustvena Istrazivanja, 23(1), 5.
- Amato, P. R., & Cheadle, J. E. (2008). Parental divorce, marital conflict and children's behavior problems: A comparison of adopted and biological children. Social Forces, 86, 1139-1161. doi:10.1353/sof.0.0025
- Clark, B. (2013). Supporting the mental health of children and youth of separating parents. Pediatrics & Child Health, 18(7), 373.
- Hartson, J. (2010). Children with two homes: Creating developmentally appropriate parenting plans for children ages zero to two. American Journal of Family Law. 23(4), 191-199.
- Pickar, D. B. (2003). Identifying children's stress-responses to divorce. Sonoma Medicine, 54, 15-17.
- Vélez, C. E., Wolchik, S. A., Tein, J. Y., & Sandler, I. (2011). Protecting children from the consequences of divorce: A longitudinal study of the effects of parenting on children's coping processes. Child Development, 82(1), 244-257.

Oklahoma State University, as an equal opportunity employer, complies with all applicable federal and state laws regarding non-discrimination and affirmative action. Oklahoma State University is committed to a policy of equal opportunity for all individuals and does not discriminate based on race, religion, age, sex, color, national origin, marital status, sexual orientation, gender identity/ expression, disability, or veteran status with regard to employment, educational programs and activities, and/or admissions. For more information, visit <https://eeo.okstate.edu>.

Issued in furtherance of Cooperative Extension work, acts of May 8 and June 30, 1914, in cooperation with the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Director of Oklahoma Cooperative Extension Service, Oklahoma State University, Stillwater, Oklahoma. This publication is printed and issued by Oklahoma State University as authorized by the Vice President for Agricultural Programs and has been prepared and distributed at a cost of 20 cents per copy. 0819 GH.